CONVENIENT COW-STABLE.

A subscriber of the American Agriculturist asks me to describe my style of cow-stable, method of fastening, etc.

First, the barn is built on rising built on a low concrete wall sixteen inches thick, and twolve inches high above the surface. It has a balloun frame, with self-supporting roof, and eighteen-feet posts; joists eight and three-fourths feet above the floor. The outside is covered with matched dropalding; the inside celled up with flooring, backed with tarred paper. The I shingles. The stables are each ten feet the manger a trench, eight liches deep and sixteen inches while, was dug, and a trench-box, made of two-inch plank with eight-inch sides, was put into this troneh, and bedded in comeat mortar, making it absolutely water-tight. A plank fourtoen luches lu width was spiked to the liner edge of the trenchbox, for the hind feet of the cows; the

The stalls are made double, to hold two cows each. The stable is spaced off into places six feet two inches wide, and two planks set upright, as seen in Fig. 1, and nalled to the joist overhead, and toe-nalled to blocks set in the chase of it. Some days after I had made chase of it. Some days after I had made mere than three-and-a-half feet from the floor (according to the size of the cows) a nock-plece, is fastened on with large wood screws, this keeping the cows out of the manger. Hotween each of these uprights a letter A is fastened, as seen in Fig. 2. This keeps the two cows standing side by side apart when cating from the manger. When not oating, they often step back, as they can, the length of the slack of their chains-iwelve luches-and con

The chain Is what is known as a four-O, and has a swivel at the "split," so that It will not kink, This chain gives the cows much freedom of movement, allows them to comfortably lie with their heads upon their sides and often allay the irritation of an itching hide. If the end bar of the chain is put through two end rings, they never unfasten. The cows are quickly tied or untied. A null is driven into the neck-plece, and when the cow is loosened, the chaln is hung over this; and when the same cow is to be tiod up, the chain is dropped over the neck and fastened without bother. The balance of Fig. 2 is self-explanatory. With this style of stable, the cara of the cows seemed reduced to the minlmum .- Amorican Agriculturist.

Into this trough the water flows only as fast as It Is used by the poultry. Thus the supply of fresh clean drink is kept continually before them. Filled with hot water in winter it will not get cold enough to freeze before night in s fairly warm house. A substitute is an air-tight keg or can with a small gim let holo near the bottom. This is stood in a pan with sides higher than the hole. The water flows into the pan, and when it has covered the orifice atops. Such a contrivance secures mesi of the advantages of the bought vessel, though I prefer the latter, as it is durable.—Georgo II. Northrop, Washington County, N. Y.
